What Interior Designers Do. An interior designer is someone who is hired to design a space. While this job may seem like simply choosing paint and placing furniture, there’s much more to it. Interior designers take part in the conceptual development and execution of their design. They often are involved in site visits and working with construction management especially when it comes to large commercial buildings.

Becoming an Interior Designer. If interior design is something you love then turning it into a career might be just what you’re looking for. While some places require interior designers to have licenses, these laws vary by location. If you’re looking to change careers without taking on more student loan debt, interior design isn’t a bad choice. Interior design is about creating a beautiful, comfortable space that makes the best of what a home or office initially offers and improving on the least appealing aspects of the space. For example, a client struggling with how best to utilize a room with an unusual geometric layout might bring in an interior designer to make the space more appealing.

Design Goals and Expectations. As an interior designer, it’s necessary to have a vision for projects you are working on, but that vision also must meet the needs and expectations of a client. For example, a client who hires you to redesign a space may have specific goals in mind, such as creating a comfortable and functional living space. It’s important to communicate with the client to ensure that your designs align with their needs and preferences.

What is interior design? The word 'Design' appeared in Latin firstly, it means making or doing some things by planning. As long as we plan some things that going to happen before we do it, this process is already designing. Interior design is 'designing media'. No matter what kind of art genre, people need to communicate with audience and user. Through the works as a media, it let artists or designers behind the screen to exchange and dialogue with the audience.
